But those who love the presidency and the office itself might be taking things a bit too far. Some are trying to make the presidency all-powerful. The concept is known as "constitutional hardball." Essentially, it's the idea that the president can do what he wants, as long as he or she can justify it. The president can ignore any Supreme Court ruling While Trump has threatened to ignore the Supreme Court's recent rulings on immigration and travel bans, it's a much higher bar to bring such a threat to fruition. "It's got nothing to do with getting into a pissing match with the court," said David Rivkin, who served as a clerk for retired Justice Anthony Kennedy, told NPR's Fresh Air in January. "We have a Constitution that says the president has powers, and the president has no powers that are not granted to him," said Rivkin. "He can't order federal employees to do things. He can order the Secret Service to protect the president. He can do other things, but the one person who can do things that are not authorized to the president is the president." While he or she is above the law, he or she is still subject to the US Constitution and to rulings by the Supreme Court, the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals, and all federal district courts. Congress, even with the president's sign-off, can pass a law that is clearly unconstitutional. The president's constitutional duty is to faithfully execute the laws. "The president can't just do whatever he or she wants
